John C. Portman, Jr.

The leadership and accomplishments of John Portman have been important factors in Atlanta's growth from a gracious southern American city to the status it now enjoys as one of the world's important dynamic international centers. Combining the role of architect and developer, John Portman has made major contributions to the skyline and development of not only Atlanta, but to other urban centers throughout the United States and the world such as New York, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Detroit, Singapore, Shanghai, and Brussels, to name a few.

John Portman is a true native son of Atlanta and except for the time he spent in the navy during World War II, he has lived and worked in Atlanta his entire life. He is a product of the Atlanta public school system and he earned his architecture degree from Georgia Tech in 1950. He worked for the required three years as an apprentice architect for the Atlanta firm of Stevens and Wilkerson and upon receiving his architectural registration in 1953, he opened his own firm.

John Portman is a life-long student of philosophy and he has been influenced particularly by the writings of Ralph Waldo Emerson and others on self reliance. He pioneered the concept of architect as developer and his success at combining these two roles has become a model that others have studied and sought to emulate.

John Portman enjoys an international reputation for excellence in architecture, urban design and real estate development and his work has been extensively studied and become the subject of many articles and books. The Atlanta High Museum of Art has on display an exhibition titled "John Portman, Art & Architecture" in recognition of his internationally acclaimed excellence not only in architecture and urban planning, but his work as an accomplished painter, sculptor and furniture designer that recognizes the extensive abilities of this unusually talented man.

Even though their work has taken John Portman and his associates all over the world, his major interest has been the welfare of his home, Atlanta. His interest in and commitment to the health and growth of Atlanta is exemplified by the development of Peachtree Center which covers 14 blocks of Atlanta's Central Business District and which he developed entirely with private funds with no public financial assistance. It was begun with the opening of the Atlanta Merchandise Mart in 1962 and its development has spanned the last fifty years with the most current building opening just two years ago. Peachtree Center was a major factor in preventing the abandonment of the City Center by the business community as occurred in many other American cities. It includes many of the city's landmark buildings such as the Westin Peachtree Plaza, the Atlanta Marriott Marquis, the SunTrust Plaza and the Hyatt Regency Atlanta. The Hyatt's first phase was completed in 1967 and its design, with its trend-setting 22-storey atrium, made architectural history and brought much acclaim not only to John Portman and the Hyatt Hotel Company, but attention and recognition to Atlanta.

The opening of the Atlanta Merchandise Mart by John Portman was the catalyst that set off the rapid development of the Atlanta convention and tourist business that has been a major factor in the economic growth of the city. Today, AmericasMart, formerly the Atlanta Merchandise Mart, attracts over half a million visitors to Atlanta each year making it a major contributor to the tourist, hospitality and restaurant business in the city.

As a founding member of Action Forum, John Portman was one of a small bi-racial group of business leaders who worked behind the scenes to help Atlanta become a role model for racial integration in the 1960's. He was the first to open non-segregated restaurants in the city when he completed the Atlanta Merchandise Mart in 1962 which contained two up-scale public restaurants. His commitment to fairness and equal opportunity has been recognized by various organizations who presented him with such awards as the "Distinguished Community Service Award" from the Urban League, the "Martin Luther King Salute to Greatness Award", the "Torch of Liberty Award" from the Anti-Defamation League and others.

John Portman has been an active participant in civic affairs. He served as President of Central Atlanta Progress from 1969 through 1971 during which time he led the city's first comprehensive study for downtown Atlanta. He was an active champion for the construction of the city's rapid rail system in the 1970's, and he campaigned to keep the international airport close to the Central Business District. He was the initiator of the concept for the Georgia World Congress Center to bolster Atlanta's growing convention industry and he served several terms as an officer and director of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce.

When John Portman opened the Atlanta Merchandise Mart in 1962, he publicly declared that Atlanta was going to be a great international city, and he has been an active participant in the activities that have made this happen. He along with Sam Ayoub of Coca-Cola and then Governor George Busby founded the World Trade Club in 1982. In 1967, he was appointed the Honorary Counsel of Denmark in which capacity he served for 30 years. His efforts have been recognized by both local and international communities and he has been awarded the "Shaping of the City Award" by the Atlanta Convention & Visitors Bureau, the "International Business Award" by the Business Chronicle and he was one of the original inductees into the "Atlanta Convention and Visitors Bureau Hospitality Hall of Fame".

John Portman's companies have offices in China, Korea and India, but his main office is in Atlanta and it is from there that he directs his national and international business. He and his associates are constant boosters of Atlanta, and their success has brought credit to Atlanta. In addition, his efforts within the City have helped its growth, shaped its appearance, improved its economic viability, and brought change and improvements to the community of which he is justifiably proud. John and his lovely wife, Jan, continue their generous support to the cultural, educational, medical and humanitarian outreach community of Atlanta. He, his sons, and his associates are committed to continuing the efforts he has made over the years to bring recognition, strength and continued growth to the city.
